AS THE OLD SAYING GOES, “YOU ARE WHAT YOU EAT”

by: Averil Stedman

These days we tend to pay more attention to the snacks and treats we are consuming on a daily basis, but what some of us seem to be neglecting is the importance of feeding our canine pals nutritious treats. You're responsible for the welfare of your family, both human and canine, so it's important that you pay close attention to what you're feeding them. If you want them to live a long and healthy life, then you need to provide them with good quality treats. Let's face it, the majority of us look at our dogs more as companions than anything else, so it should be high on our priority list to make sure they are well taken care of.

It's extremely important to read the labels on the pet treats we buy, because unfortunately a lot of the commercial brand treats out there include ingredients that are harmful to our pets. We need to be looking for treats that offer "all-natural ingredients without salt, sugar, preservatives or by-products. We also want them to contain a reasonable amount of protein and include glucosamine and chondroitin to help keep their hips and joints healthy. We owe it to our pets to provide them with high quality treats because they are there for us during thick and thin, and we want them to live a long, healthy and happy life.

Treats should not be used solely for obedience training or rewarding good behaviour because they offer added health benefits to our canine partners. Some of the added health benefits they provide include keeping our pet's teeth clean, healthy and strong as well as their joints in good physical condition. Generally, treats play an important role in our canine companions' staple diet and choosing a treat that is made by a company that is dedicated to animal wellness is noteworthy. There are only a limited number of Canadian manufacturing companies that produce and distribute all-natural, premium and holistic canine biscuits. Make sure you check out your local pet store today and surprise your pooch with a Canadian made all-natural, holistic premium biscuit.
